Consumers scooped up more than five million packages of nonprescription Claritin in the first three months of in drugstores alone, even before the allergy season began, according to the Hamacher Resource Group, a health care data firm. Wellpoint Health Networks, a large insurer, began the push to change the status of the top allergy drugs two years ago by petitioning regulators to force the makers of Claritin, Allegra and Zyrtec to make the drugs available without prescriptions. You must select a newsletter to subscribe to. Claritin is only the first medicine that could undergo this upheaval. Lower-priced generic versions of Claritin, made by Schering-Plough, are starting to appear on store shelves, and that could lower costs. Le Anne Zhao, a drug stock analyst at Fulcrum Partners, said several more manufacturers were planning their own versions. If so, that could open the door to similar F. Mark McClellan, the F. Already, Claritin's over-the-counter status and lower price is benefiting consumers without prescription drug coverage. Tell us what you think. Prilosec has already lost its patent protection, so its contribution to AstraZeneca's profits is declining. Some health plans are planning to drop almost all coverage for prescription allergy drugs. She began taking Allegra more than a year ago after trying Claritin and deciding, she said, that it "did nothing for me. Sixty-five percent of the companies that responded to a recent survey by the Washington Business Group on Health said they would only cover such drugs if an employee's doctor obtained prior authorization from the health plan because it was considered medically necessary.
