On the other hand, high shear in-line mixers can produce quality lotions and creams without many of the complications encountered with conventional mixers. Mouthwash Toothpaste Ointment Oral spray. For other uses, see Lotion disambiguation. Historically, lotions also had an advantage in that they may be spread thinly compared to a cream or ointment and may economically cover a large area of skin, but product research has steadily eroded this distinction. For example, medicated lotions such as Diprolene are often used with the intention of exerting only local effects , but absorption of the drug through the skin can occur to a small degree, resulting in systemic side effects such as hyperglycemia and glycosuria. Though this has limited use as a route of drug administration, it more commonly results in unintended, and often undesirable, consequences.
