Physician and Duke behavioral scientist Peter Ubel, who wrote a book about how patients can work with their doctors to make medical decisions, told Business Insider that this shows a problem with medical training. This group of "patients" claiming to have seen ads for the anti-inflammatory drug saw similar results: Half of the "patients" asked for oxycodone specifically, and the other half didn't. So people go begging for pain relief. After viewing the video scenarios, the doctors were asked how they would manage the case and what medication they would prescribe. Together, the findings suggest that some doctors are easily swayed by patients even when prescribing narcotics that are prone to abuse and that pharmaceutical advertisements targeted at patients may actually affect what doctors prescribe. Some physicians ask the patient to sign a contract, which may include things like having pills counted at each visit, keeping with the same doctor to avoid "doctor shopping," and regularly turning up in person. I found it insulting. Still, the results of the study could be partially attributed simply to the power of suggestion, Ubel said. Shutterstock A new study published in the April issue of the journal Medical Care highlights a troubling reality of today's health care landscape: While some patients with severe pain may legitimately require the strongest available treatments, the study shows just how easy it can be for others to get a prescription for unneeded medication. One video scenario depicted a truck driver complaining of pain. The wording of the patients' request for oxycodone was rather unnerving. The idea that patients' suggestions could influence doctors to prescribe things against their best judgment is especially troubling considering the recent spike in pain pill abuse. To determine whether patients could influence their doctors' prescribing practices, primary care physicians from six states viewed videos in which professional actors simulated a consultation with a primary care doctor. Even though the risk of addiction to opioid medications is low for chronic pain patients, heightened awareness of abuse and stepped-up law enforcement against misuse has spooked many physicians, making it harder for some pain patients to get the drugs they need. Too often, doctors prescribe potentially dangerous medications to patients who shouldn't be getting them, and what they prescribe is influenced by the pills patients ask for.
