This group of "patients" claiming to have seen ads for the anti-inflammatory drug saw similar results: Narcotics aren't recommended for people who have occupations that rely heavily on driving. To determine whether patients could influence their doctors' prescribing practices, primary care physicians from six states viewed videos in which professional actors simulated a consultation with a primary care doctor. One video scenario depicted a truck driver complaining of pain. Half of the "patients" asked for oxycodone specifically, and the other half didn't. The results suggested that even a gentle request from a patient could convince a doctor to prescribe potent, potentially dangerous narcotics even when they're not the best-practice treatment for the patient's condition. The study To determine whether patients could influence their doctors' prescribing practices, primary care physicians from six states viewed videos in which professional actors simulated a consultation with a primary care doctor. Too often, doctors prescribe potentially dangerous medications to patients who shouldn't be getting them, and what they prescribe is influenced by the pills patients ask for. While some patients with severe pain may legitimately require the strongest available treatments, the study shows just how easy it can be for others to get a prescription for unneeded medication. The wording of the patients' request for oxycodone was rather unnerving.
