Patricia Bernstein has suffered from migraine headaches since she was twelve years old. Costco sells only a fraction of the prescription drugs Walgreens sells. But about one hour later, I got a message from Walgreens stating that her plan doesn't "cover" generic rizatriptan so I'd need to authorize it. Sure, my patient figured it out, but they make more than enough on other patients with migraines to make up for it. This was great news for my patient, but the rest of us have to wonder how Costco was able to sell rizatriptan at just over one-fortieth the price Walgreens quoted? Perhaps this is about buying power. That should be good news, because generic medications often cost pharmacies 50 to times less than brand-name medications, so you would think we'd be paying less for our pills than we did 15 years ago. Possibly because this isn't the only time Walgreens or another retail pharmacy has massively overcharged someone for a generic drug. And that's with insurance! Sugar Land TX That's a lot of money for a generic medication but, if it costs that much, I can see why her insurance wanted authorization. She didn't even need insurance.
