Spokesmen for Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis declined comment on the lawsuits. Fluticasone propionate, like other corticosteroids, doesn't have an immediate effect on allergic symptoms. He added that the rising number of authorized generics may also temper generic firms' incentive to challenge patents. Anyone can file a citizen petition to express concern or comment about any issue facing the FDA, which can't approve a generic drug if there's an outstanding petition. The patent for Flonase expired in May. Apotex didn't return a call. But an Apotex victory could have resulted in a generic version years earlier. Citizen petitions are another way to block generic entry into the market, Balto said. Both companies said there is a possibility the deal won't obtain FTC clearance. In a speech last month, FTC Commissioner Jon Leibowitz said his staff would examine the deal closely and expressed concern about the mushrooming number of Plavix-like arrangements. When the Apotex deal was announced, Sanofi and Bristol-Myers said they believed the Plavix patent was valid but didn't want to risk the trial, slated to start in June. The nasal spray's generic version is made by Roxane Laboratories of Columbus, Ohio. While not commenting on the case directly, Ken Johnson, spokesman for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said in a statement that resolving litigation allows companies to focus on developing new medicines. Since then petitions have been filed on 41 such products. Meanwhile, the Federal Trade Commission announced in March it would study whether brand name manufacturers are muting competition by authorizing generic versions of their own drugs that coincide with the launch of a rival generic. Balto said the cost of filing is small, compared to what a drug company can earn by impeding competition. An authorized generic can cut the profit of the first filer by 59 percent, said Gregory Gilbert, an analyst with Merrill Lynch.
