The health clinic at Bowdoin College in Maine has elected to stop offering birth control to students altogether because of the price increases, says Sandra Hayes, the center's director. But when she goes back for more this September, she'll be hit with a bill five times that amount, something she says will definitely affect her spending. Walker-Crawford says the clinic was forced to ration what they had on hand, limiting students to buying only one prescription pack at a time instead of sets of three or more. Because the health centers used to receive prescription contraceptives at a nominal, or base price, they could tack on a few dollars to the student price to put back into the clinic in other areas. My presentations Profile Feedback Log out. Likewise, college health clinics are finding that they can do little except refer students to Planned Parenthood, where clinics are working to keep prices low despite some being affected by the law too. So the solution is that insurance will cover the price upsurge, right? But so far she says she hasn't had much luck. Published by Norma Hines Modified about 1 year ago. Jason Walker-Crawford, managing pharmacist at the University of Wisconsin-Madison's health clinic, says he found out about the change in prices when he went to place an order on Jan. Companies are already seeing an increase in Plan B, although they are unsure if it's connected to the rising price of prescription birth control. Health care providers and experts are saying it's not that simple. Organon, the maker of Cyclessa and Desogen birth control pills and the NuvaRing, says the company is not happy about having to increase prices for colleges. AHCA, a college health advocacy organization, says that since it became aware of the Deficit Reduction Act they have been doing everything they can to fight for an exemption in the law for college health centers. December 29, . The law alters how drug makers calculate Medicaid-related rebates paid to states, but it ultimately made it expensive for companies to offer schools such deep discounts on birth control.
