You mention you're interested in building your own bike and suddenly you're of no value to them as a customer. I like your suggestions, but the bike shop I have dealt with so far has been in Chicago I assume shop wrenches get tired of having people coming in all day, demanding that the wrenches replace punctured tubes. It has turned into a "there is a different bike shop for every need" mentality for me, and I absolutely hate that. All the components on this bike save the Brooks saddle and the faux leather handlebar tape are going to be polished silver, just like the wheels you see below. You might try branching out into the surrounding hinterland; Montgomery County MD and Fairfax County VA strike me as likely locations for customer-service intensive bike shops. But I am in no position to build wheels myself anytime soon, and would rather not dish out dollars to hire someone around here to do it. SOMA mixte with 8-speed internal geared hub, Shimano for lower-gear options, silver rim. A retailer can theoretically knock a lot off MSRP before they lose money on the sale, depending on the item.
