I can't tell about the proportions of the binders etc but I don't see why there would be a difference. OK, here is the scoop. This ironically, proved to be an advantage in my case, as the generic, powdery, non-waxy pills were more easily crushed up and consumed I did take the actual brand name blue football and didn't notice a difference between the effects of the generic ones but ym friends said that they are just a tad bit unpotent as the brand named ones so i don't know they are the ame thing so I am gonna keep popping them. There are however, a few other laws that address this issue. So I'm not sure exactly how your doctor calls these things in or whatever, but I would say "the generic feels different, I would feel better having the name brand and if you don't want to give it to me then I will go to another store. Personally, I think it's this one pharmaceutical company that supplies CVS with its generics that is evil. As a physician prescribing many many medications to different patients regularly I have not come across any problems with the usage of generics from the point of efficacy. I haven't had problems with other generics and I always buy generic OTC stuff like p-ephed and acetaminophen etc. Although it is possible, it might also just be an issue of tolerance building up or simply a placebo effect. CVS, for example makes it much more worthwhile to the Pharmacist to dispense generics.
