What did the research involve? Cheap Alzheimer's drug 'may help keep people out of care homes' Tuesday October 27
Place of residence was recorded during the first year of the trial and then every six months for the next three years.
Individuals were excluded if they had severe or unstable medical disorders, were receiving memantine, or had been deemed unlikely to adhere to the study regimens. It examined the effects of continued donepezil treatment on nursing home placement not on cognitive function. Home Behind the Headlines Medication Cheap Alzheimer's drug 'may help keep people out of care homes'. This is a standardised screening test used to evaluate cognitive impairment in older adults. This study cannot prove donepezil was directly responsible for keeping people from being admitted to nursing homes. The main outcome the researchers looked at was whether these people ended up being placed in a nursing home. Although randomised controlled trials are the best study design to look at whether a treatment works or not, it is difficult to draw firm conclusions from the results of this study alone. In brief, the researchers found the groups who discontinued donepezil had a roughly doubled chance of nursing home placement during the first year, compared with those who continued taking the drug hazard ratio [HR] 2. Rivastigmine has a marketing authorisation in the UK for the symptomatic treatment of mild to moderately severe Alzheimer's dementia. It has a marketing authorisation in the UK for the treatment of patients with moderate to severe Alzheimer's disease. People were included in the study if they had moderate or severe Alzheimer's disease and had been prescribed donepezil continuously for at least three months at a dose of 10mg for at least the previous six weeks. Six pence drug could keep Alzheimer's patients out of care homes. The researchers also declared they received payments from various different major pharmaceutical companies that specialise in drugs related to central nervous system diseases for work unrelated to this study.
