At this point, Riff would step in, take Velma around to the counseling area and quietly tell her that if she was in pain, she should go to the ER or the urgent care center. She ended up with a small fine and community service picking beer cans off the highway. I wonder if they switched Biff to methadone in prison. Rinse and repeat until empty, then he went back to the doctor and started the cycle over again. Turned out to be a toy. Usually within a couple of hours. No Refills was back with a big smile and a new script. To do this, we needed an override from the doctor and the insurance company. For these people suffering from AIDs, cancer, spinal damage, decades of work- or sports-related injuries, etc. Maybe your wife picked it up for you? Oxycontin and similar extended-release drugs were a godsend. For a while we had a night manager, Rocky, who would run out and tell the Robin Hoods to get lost, but Rocky, it turned out, was only marking time until his application went through at Wawa. Dan was on regular pain meds for something I assume was legit, so the doctor would write him a script for Vicodin with two refills. Ronnie would always magnanimously offer to wait while we filled it. A lot of the local pharmacies quit selling Oxycontin during that time due to robberies, so by default we were the go-to guys for all kinds of addicts, as well as patients who were prescribed Oxycontin for legitimate reasons. I guess he needed it, what with all the guns. Yes, there were a fair share of addicts and scammers out there. Tina worked days, so I usually only saw her when our shifts overlapped during the super-busy pm hours. Generally there was her main script written to last a month from her regular doctor, but towards the end of the month there would also be smaller prescriptions from ERs, urgent-care centers, and sometimes even dentists. One Doctor-Shopping Dan was even more creative. She was an obese woman with an extremely limited wardrobe of faded muumuus, a handful of badly nicotine-stained teeth, and an impressive array of diaper-less, soap-and shoe-deprived toddlers.
