While subject, then, to the limitations of most isolated clinical symptoms throughout these observations, the staining capacity of the leucocytes took its place among the features of the disease, and proved to give the most valuable prognostic sign obtainable from the examination of the blood. The Influence of Antitoxine upon the Leucocytosis of Diphtheria. Any considerable increase of poorly stained leucocytes, especially if accompanied by a decrease of well-stained cells, invariably heralded a grave or fatal turn in the disease. In rabbits suffering from injections of virulent cultures of diphtheria it was observed to continue for three to five hours. The duration of this period of hypoleucocytosis could not well be determined in patients profoundly ill, but in normal rabbits receiving an equal quantity of serum according to their weight, the hypoleucocytosis Clomipramine Anafranil was found to persist for twenty-four or even forty-eight hours. Since the intravascular leucocytosis measures in general the degree of septic absorption, it may be inferred from a high leucocytosis in diphtheria, as in pneumonia, that the infection is severe, but not that the course of the disease will prove unfavorable. Of the exceptions, two cases were very shortly fatal, and one was an adult, receiving only seven cubic centimetres of the serum. Under exactly the same conditions the injection of the same quantity of antitoxine markedly reduced the leucocytes in normal rabbit's blood, a reduction which became more pronounced with stronger serum. Yet, contrary to the conclusion of Gabritschewsky, in some very septic fatal cases there was a steady decrease of leucocytosis up to the time of death. Unless the technique of these experiments was faulty, it may safely be concluded that the hypoleucocytosis occurring after injections of antitoxine is due principally to the active immunizing agent contained in the serum, and not to shock, or Related tags: The multinuclear cells, however, were here found distinctly increased in proportion, though diminished in numbers. From an analysis of the appended tables it will readily be seen that the numbers and percentages of the poorly staining leucocytes, and usually of ameboid figures, invariably increased with the unfavorable Clomipramine 25mg course of the disease, and without relation to the total numbers Clomipramine 50 Mg of leucocytes to be found in the blood.
